Unit Summary

The Sargent plan of Education 1944 was one of numerous actions the British did to advance education in India. In 1944, John Sargent was charged with coming up with a comprehensive plan for Indian education. It envisioned an educational system that included universal, free, and mandatory primary basic education for all children between the ages of 6 and 11 (junior basic) and 11 to 14 (senior basic), as suggested by the Wardha Scheme, with senior basic or middle school serving as the final stage in the school careers of the majority of students. The research suggested that middle school students should have access to a choice of courses. Both aimed to give students a solid all-around education while also giving them some late-stage preparation for the vocations they planned to pursue once they graduated from school. All secondary schools were required to offer instruction in the mother tongue. The Sargent Report also made several other recommendations, including the elimination of adult illiteracy in about 20 years, comprehensive support for teachers' proper training, support for children with physical and mental disabilities, the organization of mandatory physical education, support for social and recreational activities, and the establishment of departments of education in the federal government and in the states.
